

The Results.....

There were many empowering aspects of this project; one was that clients could sign their artwork that others would see. Too often in an effort to protect clients, by maintaining their confidentiality, they become unnamed entities. Many clients proudly signed their name to their artwork, often John Hancock style, so everyone could see it. Another indication of how meaningful participation in this project was for our clients was seen at the unit open house. The pillowcase for each respective unit was displayed in a common area that family members would be able to view. Multiple family members commented at check-in, that their relative had told them of the display and/or artwork. Clearly they wanted to share their story and their creation with those most important to them. The responses to participating in the project are rivaled only by the astonishing responses from those viewing the pillowcase art.

After completing her pillowcase this year, Missy observed that her pillowcase last year focused more on her past and that this year's pillowcase focused more on her progress and future. She smiled about this.
